In a recent interview, MoveOn's Tom Perriello suggested the media should stop making fun of his fellow progressives for speaking out in favor of a single-payer health care system (But as The American Spectator's Ralph Peters has pointed out, Perriello's comparison to the Tea Party's stance on Social Security and Medicare is false on its face. Tea Party activists don't question the need for universal programs – but they do object to the “burdens” of the programs, such as retirement contributions and the benefits paid out to seniors. What's more, they recognize the necessity of raising the funds to pay for these programs. They simply object to the Democrat-imposed onus on the private sector of paying for a government-run system – the same system they've always derided as excessive government intrusion on the free market. Perriello's critique misses the mark. The reason most Democrats, progressives, and liberals embrace single-payer health care is simple – they believe it will lower costs for all (a claim Perriello and others don't even raise) and cut the red tape, thus saving Americans a great deal of money. As Peters noted, Perriello's claim that it would not require a single-payer system to accomplish this objective simply ignores the fact that the vast majority of Americans are already covered under one form of Medicare, and the real impact of a single-payer system would be on the expense incurred by most Americans' paychecks. Perriello's attack on the Tea Party misses the mark because it gives the impression that the Tea Party is being fair game for criticism and ridicule. If Perriello wants to convince American liberals to join the Tea Party on social issues, he must convince them that the pernicious tactics of partisan bullies are counterproductive – so he should make a different comparison. The same goes for his claim that “some people are looking for change in a way that is actually disruptive.” The shutdown and debt ceiling fights weren't disruptive or intended to be disruptive –
