Tag: Massage Therapy Depending on where you live, how much you earn and how old you are, you might be eligible for a low-income subsidy on any cash-paid medical service, including medical massage therapy. Medical massage therapists can work with Medicare to file a claim for you if you are eligible for such a program. Because Medicare is not routinely involved in payments to massage therapists, however, you will be responsible for the massage sessions you receive if you are getting them under this program. When you are paying out-of-pocket for a doctor's visit or any medical service, you are at the mercy of the provider in a number of ways. If you want to see your doctor and schedule a checkup, you have to be flexible and willing to rearrange your schedule, or you might find yourself without a doctor. If you need an expensive test or procedure, you may have to pay an advanced fee or travel to a treatment center. With the right insurance, you will have no problem with any of these issues. How Medical Massage Helps According to the American Massage Therapy Association, massage can help people with: The most common payment option for massage therapy is for insurance or health savings accounts. To be eligible for any payment plan, your massage provider will need to bill you as if you had insurance. How Much Massage Should I Get? The average total number of massage sessions per year for an average person is three. People who have acute conditions or those who are in better shape to begin with need more sessions than the average person. Massages are divided into three categories: Deep Tissue Massages, Swedish Massages and sports massages. Deep tissue is intended to be used in the beginning of a course to open up scar tissue and prepare muscles for other types of treatments. Swedish massage is used as a relaxation and stress-management technique, and sports massage, when done correctly, is used to get you ready for exercise. If you have access to a gym, you can get your massage there. If not, your provider will sometimes ask you to come to them. President Hamid Karzai and Vice President Mohammad Qasim Fahim on Monday met with Prime Minister David Cameron, Foreign Secretary William Hague, and British Defence Secretary Phillip Hammond as the U.K. tries to build a relationship with its second largest trading partner. Karzai, who has been engaged in a power struggle with Fahim's government, appeared to be unhappy with the level of partnership shown by the U.K. and said that he was "worried" about the future of the bilateral relationship, a senior member of his administration told RFE/RL's Radio Free Afghanistan. "[Karzai] said he is concerned, and that he is in favour of continued good and strong relations with the U.K., but what he is concerned about is what happened with the coalition forces, what happened with the bombing of the U.K.'s forces, and that he is worried that the U.K. will reciprocate his good relations in the future," said the official. "He said he was worried about the U.K.'s relations with his own government and that he is concerned about the protection of all coalition forces." "He said he appreciates the protection of coalition forces, but that [if] the U.K. continues to support the [Karzai] government, then it will increase the problem of the forces opposing it." Kabul has previously accused the U.K. of failing to protect its forces when they came under attack in early April. A British spokesperson could not immediately be reached for comment. Karzai and the U.K. have been trying to improve their partnership since the collapse of the NATO-led coalition in Afghanistan after the U.K. pulled out in March. But Britain's involvement in both the invasion of Iraq in 2003 and the more recent mission in Libya has led to questions about the U.K.'s commitment to Afghanistan. In the run-up to the Afghanistan mission, British Prime Minister Tony Blair said that Britain was joining an "unilateral, NATO-led, coalition in Afghanistan against al-Qa'ida." But as the mission enters its seventh year and U.S. and European military forces begin leaving the
