In the case of a conventional stand-up motorcycle including a stand (for example, see Patent Document 1), the engine is provided in the front portion of the motorcycle, and a rear wheel is disposed behind the engine. The stand of the motorcycle is provided in the rear of the motorcycle. The stand has a sliding member slidably provided in the chassis. The stand of the motorcycle is attached to a non-slidable supporting member which is provided in the chassis. A parking brake is provided to the stand. When the parking brake is not operated, the non-slidable supporting member is pushed forward by the weight of the stand. At this time, the sliding member is pushed forward so as to be pushed toward the front portion of the motorcycle. As a result, the sliding member projects from the motorcycle and is folded in a substantially U-shape. When the parking brake is operated, the parking brake is disengaged and the stand is removed upward. At this time, the stand is positioned such that the projecting portion of the sliding member is folded in a substantially U-shape and that the stand is in contact with the ground. As a parking brake, the parking brake disclosed in Patent Document 2 can be cited. This parking brake includes a recess and a stopper member. The recess is provided in a vehicle body. The stopper member is provided at the bottom of the recess. When a brake lever is in a travel position, the stopper member is brought into contact with a brake pad. In the travel position, the brake lever is maintained in the state in which the brake pad is pressed in contact with the stopper member. When the brake lever is in a non-travel position, the stopper member is retracted from the brake pad. At this time, the brake pad does not make contact with the stopper member.
