Nanoporous and macroporous polymer-based stationary phases for liquid chromatography. This paper reviews the recent advances in the synthesis of nanostructured polymer particles and their preparation on the inner pore surfaces of macroporous or nanosized polymer particles as a means to produce hydrophilic or hydrophobic stationary phases for high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC). The preparation of nanostructured polymer particles using polymerization inside the pores of macroporous particles and core/shell processes are reviewed. Synthetic procedures and important parameters such as drug loading, porosities, pore sizes and the ways in which such particles were applied as stationary phases in HPLC are briefly discussed. This review demonstrates that such macroporous and nanostructured polymer particles can be used for the determination of various classes of drugs in various sample matrices. The efficiency of these stationary phases is compared with that of silica-based particles. The range of sample matrices in which these new polymeric stationary phases are applicable is wider than that of conventional chromatographic phases.
