March 19, 2535 BC &€” In this book, the perspectives of marketing, design and production are combined into a single approach to product development. The goal is to make the customer think they know the product best. This is similar to the persuasion process used in sales. In this situation, the buyer becomes an intermediary between the product and marketing, and then he can help you develop it. He can choose a product that he really likes and thus he can be more product oriented. That is why this product must match their taste and taste. In this book you will find:
