The current classification of ischemic cerebrovascular disease includes eight major types of stroke, two minor types, and many subtypes. The principal types of stroke are lacunar infarction, cerebral infarction (CI), cerebral hemorrhage (CH), transient ischemic attack (TIA), subarachnoid hemorrhage, and stroke of undetermined etiology. The principal risk factors for stroke are hypertension, cigarette smoking, a history of atrial fibrillation, hyperlipidemia, cardiac embolism, and diabetes mellitus. Transient ischemic attacks are brief episodes of focal cerebral ischemia. This is probably due to transient occlusion of a small vessel in the brain. Cerebral infarction is defined as cerebral tissue with reduced blood flow. Lacunar infarcts are usually the result of thrombosis in perforating branches of a lenticulostriate or thalamoperforating artery. This type of infarction is often associated with minimal or no neurological deficit. The incidence of cerebral infarction is increasing. Cerebral hemorrhage is defined as the presence of blood within the parenchyma of the brain. The incidence of cerebral hemorrhage is increasing in the elderly and is an important cause of morbidity and mortality. The outcome of a patient with cerebral infarction or hemorrhage is directly related to the severity of neurological deficits and their duration. Diagnosis and treatment of these conditions are complex. The most common treatments include anticoagulation, antihypertensives, antiplatelets, and statins. Other treatments include antiplatelets, anticoagulants, and antihypertensives.Diagnosis and management of pediatric pneumonitis. Acute and chronic respiratory disease can be life-threatening to children. Because pediatricians are often the first line of defense, they need to recognize many of the
