The effect of Ca and Na on Ca-ATPase activity in the red blood cell was studied with parathormone (PTH), vitamin D (1,25-dihydroxycholecalciferol) and diphosphonate. PTH in the presence of calcium was the most effective activator. However, in the absence of Ca this was not the case. Vitamin D and diphosphonate exerted a similar effect as that of calcium, however, at concentrations higher than those used by PTH.Q: Why is this template specialisation for std::find not producing any effect? #include #include #include #include template struct A { void foo() { // using std::find typename T::iterator it = find(std::begin(v), std::end(v), foo); } private: std::vector v; }; struct B : public A { void foo() { // using std::find typename B::iterator it = find(std::begin(v), std::end(v), foo); } }; struct C : public A { void foo() { // using std::find typename C::iterator it = find(std::begin(v), std::end(v), foo); } };

One of the challenges of WLAN is the routing of traffic through the network. Wireless clients wishing to access the Internet send and receive packets through a variety of access points, each of which may be owned and controlled by a different entity. As a result, a message may be routed via multiple access points and through multiple switches before it reaches its destination. In general, a router forwards messages from a source to a destination. Routers are often configured to forward messages through a variety of access points to the most optimal destination. To assist a router in selecting an optimal path, the IEEE 802.11 Working Group is working on a new standard for routing (IEEE 802.11u). The 802.11u standard is referred to as "MAC Security", or, more colloquially, "the mesh." The mesh enables the wireless clients to elect which access point should be used for forwarding a message. The mesh standard, however, has several problems. First, the wireless clients must perform significant computations in order to select the optimal path through the mesh. The wireless clients are normally wireless access points, Wireless access points have significant memory and processing limitations. Consequently, wireless access points are generally not able to perform calculations as quickly as is desired. Second, the mesh standard relies on information known to the wireless clients to perform the calculations. That is, the mesh standard does not perform the calculations itself. As a result, the wireless clients must be able to send and receive messages to and from the mesh at the same time. That is, wireless access points must be able to transmit and receive messages simultaneously. As a result, wireless access points may not be
