When patients are referred for heart surgery, they are transferred from the Intensive Care Unit (ICU) to the surgical ward. This study explores nurses' experiences of such transfers. Theoretical perspectives of Cultural Awareness and Nursing Cultural Competence have been adopted to inform the design of a study that employed a qualitative, naturalistic inquiry design with a sample of 20 nurses from three hospitals. Data was collected by observation and in-depth interviews. The findings indicated that nurses felt constrained by a combination of personal vulnerability and institutional demands of coping with patients' emotional needs and emotional responses in the ICU. These patients were experiencing extreme levels of fear and distress that emerged as incompatible with a safe nurse-patient relationship. The findings also revealed that the emotional work performed by the nurses in the ICU was affected by poor preparation and an inauspicious start, compounded by communication difficulties that led to misunderstandings. On the other hand, their work with patients on the surgical ward was hampered by fear of physical and emotional abuse. Nurse-patient relationships on the surgical ward seemed to lack closeness and were in some instances dysfunctional. This may reflect the constraints on nursing actions as a result of nurses' isolation from the context of the hospital and the wider society. Attempts to overcome these constraints are discussed, together with implications for nurses who are transferring patients to the surgical ward.Q: Randomly selecting items out of array I am making a simple game where I have a "menu" that uses an array to create the questions that the user needs
