When I was sick I had a good job which I loved, I made and saved and saved. I bought a house, saw my parents living healthily and comfortably in the land of the free, bought a wonderful machine, moved across the world, and I managed to get into a life-threatening situation without losing any of that savings. Now I'm getting well and facing the world again, I'm not rich and that situation in Thailand was a saving grace. Instead of being grateful, I'm so full of fear and worry that I might screw this opportunity up. I'm terrified of failure and am too scared to try, I'm being incredibly stupid. How many times have we all been there? It's when that happens that being into new things is the best way to improve your life. The problem is that we've become afraid to move forward. We've been told that stepping out of our comfort zones is a big leap, we've been told that we might fail, we've been told that we might make mistakes, we've been told that we might hurt ourselves, we've been told that we might have to get back in our comfort zones. We've been told a thousand and one things that have made us believe that the act of just trying is dangerous. That's not true. It's dangerous because we're afraid to try. We're stuck in a rut. We need to get out. But trying is not dangerous, it's
