shallow, low-penetration boring operations such as boring maintenance access panels in a panel factory or surface modifications to panelways. Such tools can be provided with mechanical guidance, either alone or in conjunction with navigational waypoint data, to enable them to follow a relatively precise drilling path. Monitoring tools are often used to collect data for guiding and/or monitoring a boring tool. Such monitoring tools generally include sensors for collecting data such as data related to the position of the boring tool, orientation of the boring tool, drilling conditions such as the presence of gas, temperatures, and the like. While boring operations have been successful for boring relatively small diameter holes, they are less effective and often inadequate for boring relatively large diameter holes (e.g. larger than approximately 100 to 150 mm), such as for emergency access in a relatively small panel or panel opening
