Pdf How to.Echo memory of affective learning and extinction in humans. Adults with normal emotion-specific memory function can exhibit clinically significant and enduring distress when reminded of words or images that were previously paired with a negative affect. The authors investigated whether subjective and physiological components of this affective memory are represented in a distinct brain network. Subjects learned affective-word or -image associations followed by extinction. The subjectively negative reminder elicited an increase in subjective anxiety but not sadness or arousal. This response was accompanied by increased amygdala activation and increased skin conductance responses (SCRs) suggestive of enhanced affective learning. Reminder-induced subjective anxiety was unrelated to subsequent conditioned memory. In contrast, reminder-induced negative emotions elicited by the aversive stimulus (word or image) during extinction reinstated the acquired fear memory, an effect of the reminder that was accompanied by increased amygdala activation, greater SCRs, and greater extinction rates. The reminder-induced reinstatement was specific for the previously affected items. These findings suggest that the subjective response to a reminder is not necessary for learning and extinction of affective memories. The subjective response, however, may be an essential component of learning and extinction of emotional memories and may be used to assess the efficacy of interventions designed to alter them.

Is there a place for the middle-aged or elderly in the regenerative medicine era? Ageing is a complex process that is characterized by cellular senescence, a loss of function, and associated functional decline. Age-related disorders and degenerative diseases are among the most prevalent medical problems in the elderly population and cause a large burden on society and health care systems. The prevalence of these conditions is likely to continue to increase in the future and there is a clear need for novel therapies to treat and prevent age-related pathologies. However, the elderly population is often excluded from clinical trials. This may be due to lack of enthusiasm in the research community to develop approaches aimed at "mature" tissue and cells. However, several new regenerative therapies are already in pre
