Some U.S. health systems in rural, underserved areas fail to compete against their urban and suburban peers, costing taxpayers through higher federal Medicare payments and limiting patients' access to high-quality medical care, according to a new study. The study, published in Health Affairs, assessed 30 health systems in 20 rural states and ranked them on three metrics, including quality, efficiency and price. The study noted that while rural health systems have traditionally been viewed as places of lower quality, that is no longer always the case. In a decade-long study, which examined data for 2010-12, the researchers found that, overall, rural health systems performed better than urban health systems in all three categories. And yet, the study also showed that several rural health systems had less high-quality care than their urban and suburban counterparts. The study also found that rural health systems were significantly more efficient than urban health systems, and were significantly less expensive. "We have long held that rural health systems are worth preserving," said Dr. Brad Puffer, chief medical officer of Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, a member of the research team. "Rural health systems are more efficient than urban health systems, cost less than urban systems and generally do a better job of quality and access." Given the long wait times in rural health systems for imaging tests such as CT scans, the study's authors suggested that the most obvious solution would be to expand Medicare coverage and set targets for rural health systems to achieve "international levels of quality, efficiency and access." The federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services pay rural health systems about 53% more than their urban counterparts for many procedures, including CT scans, colonoscopies and cardiac catheterization.

This has led to double digit premium increases at some rural health systems. Last year, health insurers in Utah raised their premiums more than 50% in certain rural health systems. b7e8fdf5c8
