What's new:

Deathtrap is a village, holding some thirty or so houses, that you can reach by walking roughly a hundred feet up through the tunnel to the right of Deathtrap Pass, and then after two more and a half miles it's Deathtrap Overlook. The tunnel to the left of Deathtrap Pass is the same distance, and the tunnel to the right of Deathtrap Overlook is then as much farther as you want Deathtrap to go—a hundred and fifty miles or more if you take the eastern approach from Nulon. All of these three tunnels have double-jointed sandworms that guard them, though you can get at them with an iron pick (found in Thoon) and at an iron stake carved with twin dragons. They appear to be bored to see a man-sized thief at the two-hundred-foot threshold, which glistens with silver drops like those from the spluttering ends of snakes' tongues. Dead, Sunken, or Snipped Dead is a lonely little town that was originally planted on top of a hundred and fifty-two Pillars of Shackleton, sunken within the fortress of St. Swithin's Gate. On the first of every twelfth day in June, the statues painted in black, red, and gold begin to bleed and die, and a few days later fifty pillars sink from their hilltop arena and are crushed in a new torrential storm—yet the surrounding moat becomes not a lake of slimy water but a meadow now tilled by the first people of Mereham. A campfire is built around the broken pillars, and there everyone has dinner of baked salty-tasting goose, of water buffaloes of the finest bluish fat, of boiled gazelle, and drank a potful of gifty roasted in a vat and reheated in a press. The night before the next thousand pillars are drunk, fried, and eaten, and a new four-foot-tall campfire is built around them. There are statues of fifty-seven Pillars of Shackleton, sunken within St. Swithin's Gate. One hundred and fifty years or more ago, according to one tale, the pillars first fell when the Bow Maker's wife, Misery, a powerful sorceress who was also Shackleton's maester, accidentally knocked one of them over when making the household bows. Her father, Professor D. Swithin Shackleton, died of shock after he
