In Woeful Wobots, you command a small group of robots that has to traverse the vast, foggy worlds of this post apocalyptic land. Using your rocket-assisted legs and the laser fingers on your hands, you must defeat the foe, Xo and her army of superbugs. Collecting the golden items, using the secret power-up's and heading for the exit, are tasks to master in this deathmatch action game for the iPhone and iPod Touch. Key features:

- Simple one-button controls: - Tap to jump - Tap to shoot
- 3D-graphics - Run and jump in the unique and dynamic environments.
- Join a friend's game via Game Center* or via a link to an online leader-board - then compete against them in daily leaderboards
- Save your game anywhere - and resume it later

Gastrointestinal hydrostatic pressure in humans: its effects on function and pathology. Hydrostatic pressure is a factor in the pathogenesis of a variety of gastrointestinal disorders. Low levels of pressure may cause ulceration and erosions, whereas high levels of pressure may cause sloughing of intestinal mucosa and paralytic ileus. This review discusses the role of intraluminal hydrostatic pressure in the pathogenesis of these conditions and new therapeutic strategies based on a better understanding of the pathophysiology of the major gastrointestinal disorders. {}, Progress in Mathematics, Vol. 190, Birkhäuser, Boston, 2001. Chasing Static Features Key:

- The game is built with new modular unit and building systems that act much like the building systems used for games like Minecraft or Terraria. This provides the ability to build unit skins with entirely new interfaces.
- The game is more fun/deep than most indie games. Building a single style of unit is enough to get you far in this game.
- The rendering system is fully custom and has a lot of control-panels that span the entire game area.
- Custom Start Menu-Header/buttons are possible.

What's new:

in the City Hi All! A little late in posting because I've been having insomnia and haven't been able to get back to the computer. The day before yesterday, while driving down the Ester Valley Parkway in Westchester, I decided to take the survey from the top of the doughnut-shaped guardrail at the corner of the Parkway and the Cross-Westchester Expressway near the Lincoln Avenue exit. The picture above, although the light was poor, shows the sign installed by the WEKF for Phase 1 of the 66-mile Ester Valley Parkway Extension Project. I counted 10 signs, each with a different warning to bikes, pedestrians, and motorists. Basically, if you're a bike, just don't be stupid. If you're a pedestrian, you're screwed. If you're driving a vehicle, just put your foot down and go slow. Full disclosure: I was actually going north on the Westchester Connector (County Route 120) from my home in Mamaroneck, so I had no idea what to expect. I saw all kinds of rolling hills and, at various times, sharp turns. At one point, there was a guard rail with intersecting signs and no visibility at all of the road ahead. For all I know, I had entered some alien dimension. For the next mile or so, the road went straight and to my left. Not too far from where I started, a bicycle made a crossing, a pedestrian crossed the highway (Dwyer Avenue, I think), and a truck entered the highway (maybe the Atlantic Yard Feeder) without slowing down. What I started to notice, though, was the lack of cyclists. One might think that the island that the Parkway passes over looked a lot more like Manhattan than the Bronx or the Village. As I neared the Lincoln Avenue exit, I counted three cyclists in all: one one-way eastbound bike lane and two southbound ones. All of the signs, as stated above, advised drivers not to speed or get too close to their cars. The process of adding signage to the roadway is something I'd never observed. It's easy to understand why drivers say that the signs — although clearly visible from some buildings — don't create much deterrence to drivers who do not obey them. In fact, the signs are not even on the
