Emilio Aragn "Miliki," Lizardo Daz, Alejandro Parodi; Film. This, in turn, may lead to suboptimal information exchange, huddle discussions, and time delays as well as unsafe discussions [1]. In practice, it is often difficult to control the number of participants in a discussion and therefore to ensure that adequate information exchange and deliberations occur. Here we propose to overcome this limitation by developing structured decision support tools for health care personnel that improve information exchange and scientific discussion. We utilize semistructured methods to discuss and initiate decisions, assuming that the lack of individual preferences and the strict application of authority are factors that can be compensated for by the structured and strictly defined work processes. We designed the tools to be applicable in a dynamic clinical setting, where the immediate surroundings of the patient are changing rapidly and in many cases at the same time. We report on the pilot development of the tools in the current study and present them as the first step in a process which, once completed, can be applied in other clinical settings. In the case of information transfer by telemedicine, it is not only the type of information that plays a role in informing new medical decisions. According to the findings of Trindade-Bastos et al. [1], the level of decision support is crucial for patients' acceptability of information transfer, not only regarding the degree of control. Furthermore, the authors found that patients with more self-efficacy for information management were more informed by the information transfer than patients with less self-efficacy [1]. This suggests that the level of self-efficacy of the patient is an important factor in patient involvement. Based on the findings from the interviews, a significant reduction in the perceived time pressure of doctors was reported. Thus, the system we developed can improve the work conditions of the doctors in ambulances. The study has some limitations, which should be considered. Firstly, the study population was small, and an even larger study group could yield different results. Furthermore, the exploration of the construction of the system is the first pilot study of our team, and we cannot rule out the possibility of discussing sensitive topics (e.g. the possibility of dying in the ambulance, the feeling of "being in an accident," etc.) and their conclusions. In addition, implementation of the new method should always be
