Adenovirus vectors provide a well-established non-viral DNA delivery method for a wide range of biological and clinical applications. In clinical trials, adenovirus vectors have been used to transfer a variety of therapeutic genes, including the expression of proteins involved in hematopoietic transplantation (Vodstrcil et al., 1997; Wong, 1997; Bosch et al., 1998; Wang et al., 1996; Yang et al., 2002) and the correction of metabolic diseases (Kozziel et al., 1998; Yang et al., 2002). Recombinant adenoviruses have also been used as gene transfer vectors in a wide variety of pre-clinical animal models. Gene transfer to the central nervous system by virus-mediated gene transfer has, in particular, been demonstrated to be successful in animals, and this method has recently been developed into a human clinical trial (Tropak-Baginsky, 2002; Winkler et al., 2002; Früh, 2002). Adenoviral vectors have also been utilized in cancer gene therapy, in particular for the delivery of pro-apoptotic genes to various types of cancer cells (Haddadi et al., 2003; Morrissey, 1997; Prasad et al., 2001). Adenoviruses have also been shown to have advantageous properties as vectors for the delivery of other therapeutic genes, such as cytokines, growth factors, angiogenesis factors, and tumor suppressors (Potter, 2002; Stratford-Perricaudet et al., 2002; Nezmanov et al., 2001; Palade et al., 2003; Paladino et al., 2002; Snider et al., 2000; Tse et al., 2002). Many human adenovirus serotypes have been described and described in the literature. Most known human adenovirus serotypes, such as serotypes Ad5, Ad3, Ad7, Ad11, and Ad14, are associated with mild diseases, while Ad2, Ad4 and Ad5 are associated with more severe diseases, such as hemorrhagic
