Theoretical study of mechanisms of hydrogen transfer in cyanide molecules: reaction pathways, kinetics, and thermochemistry. A computational study of mechanisms of two important reactions between cyanide, CN^- , molecules is presented. The potential energy surfaces (PESs) of the reactions have been determined. Both stationary and transition states along the reaction pathways were located. The electronic energies, geometrical properties of the molecules, and solvation effects were taken into consideration. The lowest energy barriers were found to be composed of two components: vertical $\text{M-C-N}^{+/-}$ and M-C bond formation, where the values of the energies of the two states are mainly composed of the difference of one-electron energies of the M atom in the two states. The geometric changes responsible for the transition states were found to be very similar to those related to the M-C bond formation. We also determined the theoretical gas phase enthalpies and free energies of the reactions by using different theoretical methods and compared them with the experimental data to validate the results. The calculated values of the enthalpy and free energy of the reactions using the CCSD(T)//CCSD method are in good agreement with the experimental results. The enthalpy change ($\Delta H=0$) and the free energy change ($\Delta G=-0.1$) are determined as the best values. We also compared the predicted rate constants with the experimental results.

Influence of VNS on spontaneous re-emergence of arm tremor. We performed valsalva conditioning in healthy volunteers to study the effect of vagal-nerve stimulation (VNS) on rapid-eye-movement (REM) sleep-tremor (TR). Decreased amplitude and increased frequency of TR were observed during REM sleep after baroreceptor deactivation (conditioning). TR increased during initial VNS as compared to conditioning, although individual TR frequencies were substantially different. After subsequent VNS, TR amplitude decreased below baseline and TR frequency became similar to baseline. These results indicate that REM-TR reflects a general state of inhibition, consistent with an inhibition of thalamic and cortical neuronal oscillations by brainstem circuits. Such inhibition may be diminished by VNS, possibly via a cholinergic projection to the TR-inhibitory pathway.

My clothes, my coat, my shoes, everything is at the Salvation Army." McCormick said he wants to stay in the community that he's been blessed with.
