The permeability of the cell membrane to various substrates is dependent on the packing density of the substrate molecules within the membrane. In general, the smaller the permeating molecules, the greater their tendency to diffuse through the membrane. In contrast, the larger the permeating molecule, the greater its tendency to interact within the membrane, resulting in insertion of the molecule into the membrane and pore formation. Attempts have been made to increase permeability to alcohol by decreasing the size of the alcohol molecules. For example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,643,824 and 5,749,969 propose the use of salts of organic anhydrides with alcohols to increase permeability. Formic acid and other ionized organic compounds have been proposed to cross membranes including the blood-brain barrier by virtue of their ability to penetrate membranes when in high concentration. Others have proposed increasing permeability of the blood-brain barrier by pairing a small, membrane-permeable agent with a small lipid moiety which is taken up by cells of the blood-brain barrier and converted to a membrane-impermeable moiety, thereby allowing the membrane-permeable agent to diffuse through the cell membrane and reach the site of action in the brain, (see U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,554,289, and 5,679,725, which are incorporated by reference). U.S. Pat. No. 4,608,341 to Wagner describes the use of perfluorocarbons as blood substitutes. Such solvents are said to have unique physical properties that are superior to other solvent media. The patent teaches that the perfluorocarbons will dissolve certain biological membranes and polarize cellular membranes, and, as a result of these properties, will traverse such membranes. The patent further states that perfluorocarbons are characterized by a high isopentane specific volume and low density, and that these properties enable perfluorocarbons to pass through both the pulmonary and capillary membranes of the lung and penetrate into the blood flow. The patent discloses the use of conventional medical chemical compounds, such as cAMP analogues, in combination with perfluorocarbons to modulate biological processes or for other purposes.

Q: Can the Cross-Site request forgery (XSRF) protection be bypassed entirely? I was reading about OWASP XSRF and came across this: We just started to issue the following URL. This is a free service, so don't set any of your own cookies on it. This free service requires either JavaScript enabled or the browser and the session id cookies to be enabled. In fact, if you disable the XSRF protection in the browser, you may see a success page. Here are some things to watch out for Yes, from out of the blue. But I used to hear companies brag a lot about how they couldn't be XSRF-ed, or easily, or at all by third parties. A lot of websites on the net are built on top of ASP.NET MVC, Mono, Java, and other technologies, so it's relatively easy to write JavaScript which can bypass XSRF protection (by replacing the generated POST headers with a POST with new values). What am I missing? A: Yes, easily
