Comparison between magnetic resonance angiography and digital subtraction angiography after adult femoral arterial bypass for severe lower extremity ischemia. To analyze a multicenter clinical experience of using magnetic resonance (MR) angiography after adult femoral arterial bypass surgery to assess the patency of the bypass and the efficacy of the treatment of severe ischemia of the lower extremity, comparison between MR angiography and digital subtraction angiography (DSA) was performed at three hospitals in Japan. MR angiography was performed in eight cases (9 bypasses) before and after arterial reconstruction. MR angiographic images were evaluated immediately after surgery and then again 6 weeks later by two radiologists. Stenosis was detected in six of nine bypasses on DSA. These bypasses could not be detected by MR angiography. MR angiography showed marked parietal thrombus in two cases on immediate postoperative images. In six cases, collateral blood flow was detected on MR angiography. The arterial system of two cases could not be differentiated on immediate postoperative MR angiography, which meant that the graft was patent in these cases. All bypasses were patent on DSA. Neither perioperative complications nor mortality was associated with MR angiography. MR angiography clearly demonstrated patency of the femoral artery bypass graft and collateral blood flow with excellent image quality in all eight cases examined. Therefore, MR angiography is a valuable and non-invasive alternative for accurate assessment of the bypass.Farnesyl transferase inhibitors and novel immune-based therapies in the treatment of solid cancers: a literature review and discussion. The Ras superfamily of proteins and their posttranslational modifications have emerged as the central mediators of malignant transformation by expressing oncogenic gain-of-function mutations and dysregulation. Consequently, the inhibition of Ras function has become a focus of intense research in the search for effective anticancer agents. Ras function is inhibited by farnesyltransferase (FTase), an enzyme that modifies the C-terminal CAAX prenylation motif with farnesyl or geranylgeranyl groups. This lipid tail anchors Ras to the endoplasmic reticulum membrane where it modulates essential cellular processes and maintains 3a67dffeec
