Flying solo! Boy knows how to fly..." "Boy doesn't know how to fly...", a new voice spoke up, in a deeper, more mature tone. "Boy does know how to fly. He flies better than anyone, anywhere." "Where?" "Well, he has a flying carpet... of sorts. He owns a carpet that he uses to fly... wherever he can. He is a very clever boy, though he isn't particularly strong." "He certainly is though..." The two voices faded as the boy called Eric was now flying high into the sky. He had clearly grown and was much stronger now. "I've been trying to call for so long now... "How in... God's name could he survive all that time...?" "It's amazing he has survived. He must have got some help." The three stood there silently, staring up at the sky above and listening for anything that might be heard. "There he is... he must be coming this way." The voice was a boy's voice, but had now become old, the voice of a man that was fading slightly. The boy was flying slowly, just gliding over the forest, the strength spent from his previous flight. He was panting a little, cramping with fatigue. Yet he persevered, flying on. In the sky not far overhead, the boy could see the same red and blue lights he had seen earlier, the three coconuts now joined by the other coconuts. "If he doesn't start moving it's going to be a long hard ride to the bottom... He must be tired and hungry..." Eric's eyes beamed at the loon's words. As good as they had been telling him how to fly he didn't wish them to stop talking. He didn't even care which one of them it was. "The one on the left looks the stronger... Not like they can cover so much ground, but so much more dangerous." The slow flight later became a full flight. The coconuts slowly circling, they would also join up together and let the three coconuts aim for the lower cloud line. They would fly towards it and be too high up to be caught by the three-star beam. They would come to the end of the coconuts' range and there would be no other coconuts
