Suppose that you are given  $n$  integers  $a_1, \dots, a_n$  between  $1$  and  $N$ . Find a proper algorithm to return, with high probability, the sum of any  $r$  of these numbers. That is, if  $r$  is a positive integer, we would like to return  $s$ , where  $s$  is the sum of  $r$  of the integers, such that  $s$  is contained within the interval  $[1, N]$ . Here is a basic rule for determining if an integer  $k$  is within the given  $[1, N]$ : if  $1 \leq k \leq \sqrt{N}$  then it is not in the interval if  $k \geq \sqrt{N}$  then it is not in the interval So, how would I go about getting a "yes" or "no" in the above rule? There are also four different cases to consider (see below), which is why I am confused. A: Since there are four different cases to consider, I'll briefly describe the general approach of solving each of them. Subsets of size  $0$  or  $1$  can be handled with a simple loop over the numbers and a basic comparison test. For example, if  $r = 1$ , the  $a_i$ s are distinct, and we'll check that their sum doesn't exceed the target, while if  $r = 2$ , the  $a_i$ s are not all distinct, and we'll check that their sum doesn't exceed the target. Similarly, we'll handle the case  $r = 3$  by comparing  $a_i$  to  $a_{i+1}$  etc., until we find two numbers that agree. The next question is e79caf774b

That technique is based on the idea of causing ghost image signals which are superimposed on original image signals to be canceled by multiplying original image signals with a canceling signal. In image display apparatuses to which this technique can be applied, the technique of multiplying the original image signals with the canceling signal generates large ghost images in certain cases and does not sufficiently suppress ghost images in some cases, depending on the contents of the original image signals, and the degree of image quality deterioration caused by such ghost images. Therefore, an image
