By. to your customer it.In the quest to deepen exploration, President Donald Trump's administration has called on the nation's 69 universities and 43 national labs to deploy miniaturized exascale supercomputers. The ambitious request from the Department of Energy aims to power breakthroughs in materials science, advanced computing, nuclear energy, climate science, as well as other fields. "While we will need much more than what's currently being funded, these mini-exascale machines are a key component in our strategy for continuing to power our nation's progress," Energy Secretary Rick Perry said on Tuesday. Congress set a goal of developing chips to an exascale speed, or 1,000 times faster than existing computers, back in 2016. Only one commercially available chip, the 22-year-old Intel Xeon Phi, can achieve that speed today. But rapid developments in chip architecture mean that this will soon change. The White House said it was seeking $100 million for prototyping mini-exascale computers by next year. A total of $850 million would fund research that year and $500 million in the years after. The Energy Department also asked the 39 universities that have national labs to match the $100 million. Those labs would pay the difference if their university partners couldn't raise enough money. With the DOE's most recent funding request, the department has kicked off a six-month review process. The National Nuclear Security Administration will deliver proposals to the White House by the end of this year and it will then turn to Congress. Whether the government puts $1.35 billion into mini-exascale computers, or less, one thing is clear: this funding is important. The federal government is boosting its investment in high-powered supercomputers by offering research dollars to universities and laboratories to build them. But university administrators said Tuesday that the government is in no position to tell them what

I'm pretty bad at recursion, I could use some pointers. If I have {0x6, 0x3, 0x1, 0x0, 0x0, 0x0} //(Two zeros here is a different type of 0) Is there a way to shift
