What's new:

"In addition to the single player campaign, XBLA and PSN also offer online play. As in Halo 3, the Spartan Ops emergency missions available from the main menu can be accessed online. "Reclaimer" or "Operation" as seen in the previous trailer are apparently some sort of online event in addition to the usual game modes. " In addition to being a rechargeable? feature, your brains are also linked to other Spartans' via a new wireless transceiver that works like a glorified wifi hotspot. A wide, rushing but idyllic, neon landscape appears over the derelict spaceship (is it the Seraph, or somebody else's war vessel? I'm heading over to look in more detail when I get back to my room) with swaying palm trees, dry canyons, and the encroachment of fog. Because of the nature of the transceiver, the tentacles of a nearby enemy will appear on the screen and it's only to make sure that you're still onboard to elude them. More than that I'm no longer sure what I can say. I am regularly picking them up and lining them up at the ready, if you know what I mean, and I can say that they even looked like the drooping umbilicus of a concept autopsy on a hot and summery day in the tower of music. Just shout down a friend, point him at the screen and he'll be able to tell you what most of this all looks like. I didn't get any photos of multiplayer last time around, so I won't do that this time. I played the campaign pretty much through from start to end. I never played a single multiplayer game in the original

As I played the campaign, though, I didn't really feel like I was playing the campaign from Halo 3. Rather I was watching a brand-new story being scripted, with absolutely no reference to Halo 3. I had no expectation of any of the
