The official game website is located at Why is the RGB value of the first pixel of an image different from the last pixel? Why is the RGB value of the first pixel of an image different from the last pixel? I can clearly see this is happening. It's happening for multiple images of a particular image. A: The color of the pixels are not all the same. It depends on the texture's and alphamap's resolution. If you want an answer why it's happening, I think it's because your texture might be stored in a memory buffer. Most of the times, a texture will be compressed and will be 4 or 8 bytes that represent the color values of each texel. You can read about texel's in this link. @import

Like a Flutter of Wings By Helen R. Hughson, 7/28/13 In our in-house meeting of The Harvest, we discussed creativity. Perhaps the most creative part of being a Christian is knowing that one's traditions give way to Jesus. Being a Christian is all about listening to God, and obeying him, and trying to follow those who have gone before. Since God is in control of the universe, we can be confident that he has the solution to all the problems we face. We also discussed the idea of being a testimony. A testimony is someone who has been changed by the experience. When I was younger, I thought that someone could tell if someone was really a Christian by that person's behavior. And, I have definitely seen a difference in many of my friends since I had a personal relationship with Jesus. We didn't talk about the "flutter of wings" in this meeting, but there is a small, almost fluttery, moment in the life of a person who is on a true spiritual path. I think of that as the moment you get the feeling that you have wings, that you can fly, that you are separate from the material plane that everyone else is on. As you walk down the "dark road" (1 Corinthians 13:12) you are no longer tied to the earth; no longer held by the things of this world; you don't want the things of this world and you don't want to hurt
