What's new:

Tag Archives: California Pizza Kitchen When I think of comfort food, a pasta and meat sauce comes to mind. However, it's not pasta and meat sauce that I'm best known for. For years, I've been making a Tuscan-style Meatball sub loaded with all sorts of ingredients. When I say made, I mean scraped off the deep fryer. At the time, my friends told me that the flavors would pair so well together, I might as well just make the dish. I loved the story the familiar flavors told and the thought of creating something together with everything I already knew. Except, now it sits on the top of a list of recipes I'd like to master. Those friends weren't wrong, it's been a while since I've made the recipe and I still love all the ingredients. Slowly, I've discovered that the first half of the recipe isn't as simple as it seems, especially for cheese sauces. But don't worry, the second half is actually well worth the extra work. Let me show you. Here's the recipe! *** This dish could easily be on a different list of comfort foods, but it was on my list because of its size. I was desperate to make a large dish for someone's birthday, but couldn't come up with a solution. I decided to scour the internet for ideas and came across taco chip oregano sauce. I've never used these mini rice chips before, but the idea immediately jumped out at me. Instead of a taco sauce, I could easily use a cheese sauce and I'd have a little food to put away for the back-to-school days. Then, I could leave a little box of treats for when my child is hungry. Now, I'm not talking about the sugary cereal type treats, but goodies like a cupcake. While visiting my friend's house, I casually asked about the birthday dinner. It had just been served a few hours before and while my friend hadn't got hungry, her kids could've devoured the leftovers, especially the pasta dish. I replied, "No need to send anything out for my friend's back-to-school treat. I have such a great idea!" But, it had already touched off the imagination
