What's new:

1], which supports the phylogenetic evidence that this species belongs to the basal Culicoides. The copy number of the large families in both genomes was greater than 4 across the genome. The copy number of the small C6/36-derived families (Csk, Csrp, Csx) showed a punctuation-like pattern across the genome, with generally lower copy numbers.

Variant discovery ----- The read-based variant discovery of the C6/36 reference genome identified five specific SNPs (including one indel) in the region of the Culicoides-specific intron, but no specific sequence variants were found in the C6/36 genome or in the Bu-1 genome. Sequence variations of the Bu-1 genome identified 1,107 candidate variants (Table S3{ref-type="supplementary-material"}). The vast majority of them were SNPs, but we could identify 9 possible indel variants as well as a possible fusion of 2 SNPs (indel at position 112,171,418). The variant calls were analyzed in the context of the BU-1 transcriptome, revealing 53 specific variants in 48 transcripts (Table S5{ref-type="supplementary-material"}). The majority of transcripts contained one or, less often, more than one variant. Interestingly, multiple SNPs were observed in transcripts of the genes Culicoides salivary antigen (Csal) 2, 2' binding protein (C2'BP), dipeptidyl peptidase III-like protein (DPPIII-like), and Culicoides salivary protein (Csp6), whereas no variants were found for the chymotrypsin-like serine protease (Csp1), and chymotrypsinogen B (Cgb).

Discussion ===== We have identified a new Culicoides species, C. nelsoni and performed a comprehensive genomic analysis of the Culicoides reference genome (Bu-1), which is paired with high-throughput transcriptome analysis of this species. We show that C. nelsoni is the mid-level divergent member of the genus Culico
