The last time Luc-Andre Girard heard the gunshot, it sounded like a firecracker. The 22-year-old's first reaction was to whirl around, wondering if the sound was coming from his family, who were visiting the community of Big Bay de Noc, Quebec, and finding no one else around. They were on the east end of the island, about two kilometres from where the bullet found its way through the car Girard is driving on their camping trip and into the body of a 15-year-old boy who was struck in the head. Story continues below advertisement It was late on the second night of their camping trip in Quebec when the boy was fatally struck while trying to stop an incoming bullet. Mr. Girard had stopped the car and was on his way back into the woods, out of range of the shooter, when he heard the gunshot. He had been lured back into the shooting. The shooting struck a nerve in Quebec. It was only a week ago that the province's justice minister announced an investigation into the rash of shootings that have claimed the lives of four teens over a seven-week span, and prompted extensive police patrols and public warnings about the dangers of firearms. Four of the five accused teens - two 17-year-olds and two 15-year-olds - have been charged with three counts each of first-degree murder. Two of the accused appear in court to answer the charges. The 14-year-old accused is being tried in juvenile court. Quebec has never seen such a spate of gun violence. "This is a collective victim," said the Rev. David Rouleau, the mayor of the St-Tite Orthodox church in the community. "It is affecting everyone in the community." The tragedy has rippled through the community in Big Bay de Noc. Story continues below advertisement Girard said the shooting put a bandage over the community's pain, but the injury didn't end there. On the morning after the shooting, Girard's brother asked e79caf774b
