Chrome and E memory leak (Chrome.exe process) I am trying to learn about memory leak handling in .NET using DLLs. So I wrote up a simple program that builds on to a single string instance and then immediately throws it away. The string is simple: public class StringClass { private string _temp; public StringContent () { return _temp; } public StringClass () { public StringClass(string name) { _temp = name; } } After running this in my development computer (64 bit Windows 7) in both Internet Explorer and Google Chrome, a Chrome.exe process continues to grow. The E.exe process abruptly finishes and memory is released. The output is as follows (sample output in the case that someone copies and pastes the code): Starting memory leak test Chrome memory count = 5.0 E memory count = 5.0 Has about 20000000 bytes of heap. Please send back to... I wrote a trivial program like this in C++ I ran it on Windows XP and compiled as x64 (that's all). The result was the same. Internet Explorer process finished and memory was released. But the C++ program continued to leak a bit of memory even after I closed the executable. In fact, the memory count didn't

Q: Formula to determine how old a person really is Recently I came across an old question: How old is a person who will be exactly $5$ years on $January$ $1$, $1960$. The answer was $75$ but I had trouble reaching this answer. I tried to calculate the difference between the number of $days$ passed and the number of $days$ remaining but I got that $6.0$ which is quite inaccurate. I then used the approach of counting $n$ years into $a$ weeks and then to $365$ days and use that information to get the difference between the two. That worked quite well, but I had to estimate the number of years into weeks, and then use that number to estimate the number of days. The question is, is there any formula to calculate the difference between the number of days passed and the number of days remaining as if
