Category:AutodeskInfection and inflammation of the lower airway in asthma: A potential role for genetic variation in matrix metalloproteinase-9. Severe asthma is a major cause of morbidity and mortality. While infection has long been known to exacerbate asthma, it is now recognized as a trigger for more chronic diseases such as bronchiectasis and the spectrum of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). The factors involved in chronic disease development are not fully understood, but recent research has focused on the role of matrix metalloproteinases in chronic inflammation and remodelling in various tissues, including the airways. This has led to the concept of an asthma endotype that describes distinct phenotypes based on specific triggers, inflammatory mediators and inflammatory pathways. It is now clear that human matrix metalloproteinases play important roles in the inflammatory response to inhaled allergens. In this review we discuss the available evidence for matrix metalloproteinase involvement in severe asthma and provide new insights into possible mechanisms. Specifically, we discuss the role of MMP-9, an enzyme produced by inflammatory cells and airway structural cells, in the development of remodelling and the role of genetic variation in MMP-9 in severe asthma, COPD and bronchiectasis.Q: Classical n:m Model in Symphony2 I have a problem with my n:m relationship in Symphony2.
