Running On iOS With Alien Dalvik2.0 2. But why a web app?The amount of mobile network traffic has increased dramatically, resulting in a highly dynamic wireless network environment. This increased traffic is due to an increasing number of users, the increased use of data in place of voice, and more complex applications. In the past, at least some of this increase in the amount of data has been offset by improvements in network technology, which resulted in an increased bandwidth per unit of time. The increase in bandwidth per unit of time has allowed for increased network traffic and has contributed to an increase in the number of users and to the use of new, more complex applications. However, as the number of users continues to increase and as some applications continue to become more complex, the amount of network traffic continues to increase, and the ability of the cellular network to handle this increased network traffic is becoming a serious problem. The cellular network is an inherently shared network. A cellular network includes a number of base stations that each act as relays between the cellular network and a number of mobile devices. The base stations communicate with the mobile devices over an assigned frequency or range of frequencies to allow information to be relayed between the mobile devices and other network devices. In order to allow for the division of the available frequency spectrum between a number of different cellular network systems, these different cellular network systems typically employ different code sets. This allows for the base stations of different cellular network systems to use different assigned frequencies. However, this division of the available spectrum is not
