Spinal cord compression caused by neuroblastoma and ganglioneuroma: long-term outcome after treatment. The clinical course and the long-term outcomes in seven children with spinal cord compression caused by primary or metastatic neuroblastoma (n = 5) or ganglioneuroma (n = 2) were retrospectively reviewed. The patients were treated with chemotherapy, surgical resection, radiotherapy, or biotherapy. The most common presenting symptom was motor weakness. In patients without an initial lesion in the spinal canal, who had received radiotherapy before biotherapy (n = 2), progressive neurological worsening was rapidly observed, and paraplegia soon ensued. In contrast, spinal cord compression from primary or metastatic lesions in the spinal canal was successfully treated by biotherapy with a response rate of 86%. In patients who had initially received chemotherapy followed by radiosurgery (n = 2), motor weakness improved, and spinal arachnoiditis was revealed on magnetic resonance imaging in both cases. However, all patients who had undergone surgical resection without radiotherapy showed no neurological worsening. These results suggest that neuroradiological assessment of the spinal cord by magnetic resonance imaging should be performed for patients with primary or metastatic lesions in the spinal canal to evaluate whether they are at risk of developing progressive paraplegia.
