Skaerfaher et al. \[@b18-amjcaserep-16-45\] reported another case of successful rescue of an explosive upper airway obstruction related to an inflamed nasopharyngeal stenosis by a gold weight. No complications were observed during the follow-up period. Byrne et al. \[@b19-amjcaserep-16-45\] in 1991 suggested a novel approach to treating OSA, employing a silicone rubber mandibular bar, to prevent collapse of the velopharyngeal valve. Silicone rubber was approved by the FDA in 1993 for ophthalmologic use and has been used since then for reconstruction of ocular defects. Although silicone is not biologically inert and has had reported cases of complications, especially with prolonged use \[@b20-amjcaserep-16-45\], it has largely replaced material previously used to prevent palatal arch collapse. When the TEMi device was introduced in 2004, it allowed preservation of the velopharyngeal valve and its function, by applying pressure to the posterior surface of the velopharynx \[@b21-amjcaserep-16-45\],\[@b22-amjcaserep-16-45\]. Despite achieving a large increase in the awareness of OSA and its management

| Sites without Google Analytics Google Analytics. It's the internet, of course the internet is using it. It is the invisible, eye of the biggest most complete data collection system available on the internet. And most people can't see or understand it and just carry on using it. At last count Google Analytics had somewhere around 1550 different clients. It is just one of the many pieces of software or site-metrics software available to the internet community. They all do the same thing, track visitor statistics, visitor behaviour and generally inform you on what users are doing. This is great for business sites, social networks, news sites and even dark patterns, there are webservices such as the ones below that will read data from analytics software and spit them back to you. They are free, anyone can sign up. You just sign-up to a company, you give them access to your webpages, then the company has access to your data. When I first heard of them, I thought it was great. They monitor visitor behaviour and tell you if visits to your webpages increase, decrease or do nothing. This can be very useful when you are deciding how you will use visitors to your website. I want to use the website to serve as a traffic bait. I want visitors to come by and to read something, then I want to encourage them to become members if they like what they have read. People hate being tricked. The problem with Google Analytics is it puts spying in the name. You can see who is visiting your website, you can see when they visit and from which country they come. You can see things like gender, age, motivations and so on, it can use cookies to provide those stats too. Cookies are small program files that clients place on your client's computer so they can continue working on your website. But, the problem is those cookies can take up to a year to clear. By hiding in the name of website monitoring and security you are actually undermining the very heart of the internet. You are ruining peoples lives. I did all this for the smallest of reasons, I only wanted to know what visitors to my site wanted, and what I could use to improve it, and hey, it wasn't going to hurt anybody, so why would I hide it? The problem is...social networks are the same. I love the internet, I was one who

Mobile communication systems were developed to provide mobile users with communication services. With the rapid advance of technologies, the mobile communication systems have evolved to the level capable of providing high rate data services as well as voice telephony services. Recently, standardization for a long term evolution (LTE) project has been started in the 3rd generation partnership project (3GPP) as a next generation mobile communication system which is a technology upsized version from the existing wireless communication system. LTE is based upon orthogonal frequency division multiplexing (OFDM) and utilizes technologies such as multiple-input multiple-output (MIMO), and is currently widely used. Typically, the wireless communication system divides one frame having a predetermined time duration and a predetermined frequency bandwidth into a plurality of time slots and a plurality of frequency RBs and transmits data through the time slots and the frequency RBs. The wireless communication system allocates more time resources to a user having a good channel status, such that the user can be effectively allocated with the time resources and increased for the user's channel statuses. In this way, the user having a bad channel status can be decreased and the system performance can be relatively increased. However, the user having the good channel status having greater number of time resources allocated thereto may increase the degree of interference caused when the user user having the bad channel status allocated a large number of time resources.
