Show ID: 11599. Bejart, Bejart.DESCRPTION: (Adapted from the application) The goal of this study is to understand how the brain processes information about actions. The experiments will investigate whether the neural systems underlying the formation of action names and action representations are similar or distinct. Subjects will perform an experiment in which they are presented with a picture of an object, a statement about the object, and then asked to judge which of two pictures resembles the picture of the object. During the fixation period the subjects will view the pictures of the objects in the "action-on-object" experiments. During the comprehension period subjects will view the pictures of the objects in the "action-words" experiments. The subjects will be asked to judge the frequency of the produced words describing the object. Action representation areas (posterior superior temporal sulcus) have been associated with the formation of action representations. Thus, some of these areas will be explored in the action-on-object tasks to determine if they contain action representations. In the action-word tasks, the subjects will be asked to answer whether the action words can serve as common denominators for objects. If the action-word areas contain action representations, then they should also show effects that have been observed in the action-on-object tasks. The experiments will determine whether the representations include both the object and the associated action. A second goal is to determine if the neuronal systems that represent actions are similar to the cortical systems that represent general categories, such as tools or animals. In the action-on-object task, an immediate object should elicit stronger activity than the same object after a delay. In the action-word task, subjects should be more likely to refer to the object by the action name after a delay. Both of these tasks will be compared with object and word categorization tasks to determine whether the neuronal systems processing actions are distinct from those that process object and word categories. These comparisons will determine whether the mechanisms involved in forming representations of actions reflect those involved in forming representations
