[b]samsad bengali to.The present invention relates to mechanical devices that enable a user to load and unload cartons and containers. The patent literature is replete with examples of mechanical devices that attempt to facilitate the loading or unloading of objects. These devices fall into two broad categories: devices that engage the outside of the container and devices that engage the inside of the container. Examples of the first category include, for instance, U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,944,028 and 5,737,791. As an example of the second category, a typical device of this type has a container-engaging rod that is insertable into the interior of a container and a plunger that is moveable along the rod. When the plunger is pressed down against the bottom of the container, the plunger engages the bottom of the container and urges the container to the upward position. When the plunger is released, the container drops into the container-engaging rod. As a general rule, the closer the container-engaging rod is to the bottom of the container, the greater the force required to depress the plunger to engage the bottom of the container. If the movement of the container-engaging rod is relatively slow, the force required to depress the plunger is relatively low. If the movement of the container-engaging rod is relatively fast, the force required to depress the plunger is relatively high. Mechanical devices of this type are commonly provided with means for adjusting the speed of the plunger and the rod to accommodate containers having different depths. Various devices have also been proposed for adjusting the vertical position of the container-engaging rod. For instance, certain devices require the user to push a button on a handle of the device to move the rod to a desired position. Other devices have to be adjusted by rotating a screw or other component having a corresponding pitch screw. There is a need, for instance, in the trucking industry for a mechanical device of this type, but which eliminates the requirement for a manual adjustment of the device by a user to move the rod to a desired position. The present invention provides such a device. 6d1f23a050
