To investigate the differences between women with and without vaginal delivery in a cohort study of pre-menopausal women presenting with pelvic and perineal pain. We conducted a retrospective cohort study of women with pelvic and perineal pain. The study population comprised 33,928 women over 19 years of age who visited a clinic between

September 2005 and June 2009. Those with an International Classification of Diseases code for 'obstetric injury' were investigated. The clinic records of each woman in the study were reviewed; they were assessed by two of the authors independently to determine whether the symptoms of pelvic and perineal pain associated with previous vaginal delivery were greater or less severe than those associated with those without vaginal delivery, and to identify whether age and parity affected the differences. Women with previous vaginal delivery had lower incidences of pelvic (P 6d1f23a050
