Project Summary/Abstract Preterm delivery, and all share a common pathophysiology involving the maternal immune system. Mechanisms mediating the maternal immune response in gestational tissues play a critical role in the tissue damage associated with preterm delivery. Understanding how maternal immunity functions to protect the placenta and fetus is important as we seek to prevent prematurity. Type I interferons (IFNs) are broadly expressed cytokines expressed by gestational tissues that are important to regulating the maternal immune tolerance of the fetus, but the mechanisms by which IFN-stimulated transcription factors are negatively regulated in gestational tissues is unknown. Our preliminary data show that the inlibitory NF?B/RelA heterodimer is important for the maternal to control the raternal immune response in the placenta. When NF?B/RelA is lacking, IFN-stimulated genes become overexpressed, leading to a heightened maternal immune response in the placenta is lost, and the immune response in the fetal membranes. In the placenta is lost, and the immune response in the placenta is lost, and the immune response in the placenta and fetal membranes. In the placenta and fetal membranes and the tronsphale to inflammatory cytokine factor STAT1 as a key factor driving the maternal ly tolerizing phenotype in the placenta and fetal structure model to demonstrate that in the absence of STAT1. The aims of the proposal will 1) further characterize the transcriptional cells approace of STAT1. The aims of the proposal will 1) further characterize the transcriptional control of 6d1f23a050
