The disinfection by-products (DBPs) generation during water disinfection has drawn much attention in the last few decades due to its possible effects to the human health. Although the determination of DBPs is a challenge, the routine of chemical analysis is not only costly and time-consuming, but also subject to the introduction of new methods and techniques. The existing analytical techniques for DBPs detection have been summarized in this review. In the reviewed methodologies, the spectroscopic analysis, which is usually used for trace and inorganic contaminants, plays a pivotal role. Besides, this review also highlights on the new detection techniques and software for improved analysis. In addition, the effects of DBPs on human health are discussed. Article content Toronto police are investigating after two attacks were reported on Monday. First, someone was assaulted just before noon while walking on College Street, near St. Clair Ave. W., just east of Shaw Street. Police say it may be the same suspect who attacked a man who was sitting in the passenger seat of a vehicle parked on a laneway just south

Empowerment in Development

Empowerment in Development (EID) is the process of preparing a person to take charge of their own fate and improve their position in society by changing negative attitudes and beliefs associated with the culture in which they are living. The EID model is the most widely used method to do this, and the effect of this is seen in communities in which one person has managed to overcome the attitude
